It has been suggested that legislation be adopted to clarify the Colorado law concerning open-end encumbrances. In the opinion of the writer, such legislation is, at the present time, not necessary. The distinction between obligatory and optional open-end encumbrances has been made certain by court decision. The rights of the mortgagee under an optional open-end encumbrance are well settled, and an intervening lienor can easily protect his rights by ascertaining the total amount advanced under the prior encumbrance and by giving immediate actual notice to the mortgagee of his interest. It seems, therefore, that any statute would only complicate an already well-established rule of law and would afford no additional protection to any of the parties.
