Denver Bar Association October Meeting

At the regular October 1st meeting of the Denver Bar Association, the Denver lawyers were privileged to hear Frederic P. Storke, acting dean of the Law School of the University of Colorado, give a very fine discussion of the subject, "The Lawyer's Job and the Lawyer's Training."

In discussing what's wrong and what's right with legal education, Dean Storke stated that the case method of teaching law, with its informal discussions between student and professor, was certainly right. It does appear, however, that the legal education system does need re-vamping.

First we should answer the question, "What is a legal education supposed to do?" Critics of present law school methods say that there should be some teaching of techniques in law school. The law school must prepare a lawyer to be an advocate in court, in the preparation of cases, and in advising clients. It must prepare the lawyer for several types of practice: independent practice of a small town; the small cog in big machine type of practice of the large city; with government bureaus; in business.

A lawyer is inherently more than a lawyer, and must know something besides the law. He has always been a public servant. One of the great functions of a lawyer is that of policy making. In an organization, the organization always looks to the lawyer for advice on policy. The question is, "Is his training adequate for policy making?" It is said that the giving of advice is not the job of the lawyer, but lawyers are not that kind of people, and they will always give that advice. It is, therefore, the job of the law school to educate men to handle problems that transcend legal knowledge.

In this set-up, the college should give the necessary background and the law school the technical knowledge. These two cannot be separated.
