1-1-2011

Trick Rider

Jen Tynes
University of Denver

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.du.edu/etd

Part of the Poetry Commons

Recommended Citation
https://digitalcommons.du.edu/etd/942

This Dissertation is brought to you for free and open access by the Graduate Studies at Digital Commons @ DU. It has been accepted for inclusion in Electronic Theses and Dissertations by an authorized administrator of Digital Commons @ DU. For more information, please contact jennifer.cox@du.edu,dig-commons@du.edu.
TRICK RIDER

A Dissertation

Presented to the Faculty of Arts and Humanities
University of Denver

In Partial Fulfillment of the Requirements for the Degree Doctor of Philosophy

by

Jen Tynes

June 2011

Advisor: Eleni Sikelianos
ABSTRACT

Trick Rider is a book-length poem in four sections, which uses characteristics of the epic and gothic, as well as strategies of chance operations, to explore the compositional process in relation to time, how time is experienced during the writing process and is communicated through the text as an object and through the process of reading. The polyphonic speaker of Trick Rider is a stunt double and experiences doubling, being both representative of and an outsider to the community she channels; this tension is simultaneously cause and effect of the text.
Contents

The Fabulous Bilocation of B. Lee .................................................................1

Return Period.............................................................................................27

The Black Mariah.......................................................................................52

Bone Period...............................................................................................77

And Still the Underbelly, Or Parallel Experience (Some Afterword).......102

Works Cited...............................................................................................117
"well there are millions more of dead women not just the few you are hey nonny."

-Alma, or the Dead Women, Alice Notley
"They had made her a veil out of a mosquito bar so the auger holes in her face wouldn't show." When the body in question is fully peopled, we like to call it a way. I know she is holding up one end of our caravan; I can see the rock glitter in our treads, the ceremony moving down the line, shedding consonance and tension.

There’s a long way to travel between the off-looking mountains and the on-looking lake. We prepare to put on a performance like a rabbit skin. First remove it from the story. When the ceremony reaches me, she has buzzed out of it like a dry fly. I say B. Lee, B. Lee to call everyone in.

pea-stone pea-stone pea-stone although they lack image-forming eyes in the face it looks like movement practice contractions neon

flags as indicators

the road crew's maternal artwork sacrilegious body fluid soaks the grounded wire hawk face tic tock took down with one leather glove on her arm the fit regains its raptor natural tongue movement face rise from feathered pea-stone engine pop a tire iron as prod on the ground water breaks B. Lee un-earths quick.

Week one of our residence 21 bats tangled with the big tent; week two we were put upon by 21 flying squirrels. I scrapbooked segments of eyes and hair and telling detritus. I sang why oh why would you tell this kind of story. Week three has been a cloud of whippoorwills who leave burn marks on the dishes; we have to dust every surface with black pepper, and still all the stomachs flop and gurgle. I can’t go to sleep. I can’t be myself. I keep hearing things. I’m just repeating what was said. to extract my tongue just up the body how narrowly it missed the middle, whippoorwill 0 moment of betray what swallows have large gaping points of the body. A shivering chain grieving process, vinegar night jar or whippoorwill hurricane in. When the body first sank or warning comes when

the body. How narrowly it missed.
I’m not trying to mythologize anyone. I want to glisten between the membranes of cause and effect. I don’t mean I would glisten; I’m still totally lonely. On the penultimate night we stood around the newly lost body and performed all our stories until it sunk in. The smell of loam and the stink of cinnabar like an indentation in all our pillows, the size and shape of the bitter-sweetest head. That is what I mean when I say it all sunk in. None of the bellies that once filled out the narrative would be taking our names anymore. The body took all of them and B. Lee was what was left. B. Lee left us the same way. We had rehearsed a dozen times and still the underbelly, or parallel experience. I’m a half-inch shorter and that is why it felt different, when we carried it together.
Caul licked and cow

headed toward a billowing outwardly: B. Lee goes unresponsive every time she faces lightbreastbreathing plants in the window bend

toward it better a floating shrapnel chemo therapy later for now golden bobcat

beginner tracks harden & encircle the body

cycle the fern fronds

up the backs and tender is the biggest

organ how B. Lee’s

skin became another place to story

kiss not story

tell.
In a time of crisis the body has to be careful not to step too far out into the road.

When a participant needs to uncouple, they go down to Memphis for a little while.

Maybe when the body comes back she’ll be able to see and say where we're coming from, the indentation that signifies a hitchhiker’s presence. The planting of light jars all over the tent doesn’t make us any more synchronized. When I step out of my mark and into hers, I cannot expand on the glamour. Don’t misunderstand me; she’s a whole village. She doesn’t misunderstand me.
The scabbing forms a white stain on the parachute, parachute body and a white-out mind has bagged and gotten indirectly like a warning it's hard to remember larger, actual the beginning of the story ankle bones weighted runs all over the place their empty parachutes a crust borne body we claimed of priors, deviled bowls and fiberglass take the care away as our own took up from the beams of from where gowns over

even they are yellow petals stuck to action dead they send the rainy animal

from the moon “you” burn out notices like whelps have problems with watching this is not our hideous wrapped around her feet this is not our skinflint body look at the stitches.

When you read me by yourself in some clearing beyond our ranges, I feel a little fragged. Tracing the shadow of our sightline, you just make another shadow. I fall inside like a well falls inside the ground. What I’m saying is, I know how to write this and talk to you at the same time. It’s been 17 days since we rode the body into town and no one has dictated anything on her. We need a good recorder like we need some mother. My oratorical style is the sound a cat makes sucking out a baby’s breath, the hiss of hot formula against a blue wrist, plus I always imagine I’m significantly taller. We will all be straight as arrows when she gets here, and pointing in all different directions. I will cross paths with you and lower my binoculars so you don’t feel anything too quickly.
In this hollow there is only one building one room school house has turned into shelter shell-lined and cushions and everything written in pink dust across black boards

B. Lee is starting not only to be but to see where three girls with their backs to the room were delivered home.

Where the deep polished rift of the lectern used to cradle.

A girl shovels the black belly central into the dark B. Lee is beginning to see the phosphorescence of her salmon colored dress and the hotter glow of the smile-shaped gash along her neck, the way skin has of puckering around long dissolved stitches. Do we let it get angry. The girl is telling a Lifetime movie her mother watches over and over, her vanished auntie, North America.

The boy hasn’t been talked about yet but B. Lee is beginning to sense his salt water breath proximity on the other side of the pot belly. He has no external anatomy to speak of. To have language for a thing you need a tongue or finger pads at least. B. Lee watches him cut patterns from a construction paper activity book for the “no two are alike” bulletin board. There's someone sleeping on the blade.

Outside the mowers move in long deep lines doubling back on themselves to make an impression.

This is the closest thing we get to finding her some features.

This is the place I keep saving with my fingers.

I don’t know how many of us actually want to be here. Everyone naturally two-times the story. In the morning I took all the bones right out of it, as the saying goes, but there was still something to fight against, the desire to be longer. If I can’t be a taller tale then we can all just lie down in a circle around B. Lee and surround the body.

We can be their intention until something is related. Until we hear otherwise. I gave her all my dead, collapsible family and I gave her my red, wet children, and the bird’s soul-sucking whistle became her name, so that’s twice borrowed. I need you to keep being frustrated when I repeat the word dead. I need the embroidery flossed kids to keep fidgeting as a meter. We can’t end things with an ending the way lonely giants do. I suspect we’re going to have to sing a little.
The bone we pick to display has no reason for being in one place this long. All sides are taken and worn down in the same places for everyone, the places that our chests have caved in and the places that our heads have caved in. For example the young or early sounds of morning birds when B. Lee is falling asleep for the very first time. Sometimes asking whether she is also dead creates an excuse to her body which is adjacent to where she dreams her very first dream, in which her body changes into a red knot like a baby left too long in a shady spot to cry it out.
In the kitchen of her dream it is impossible to move through her. The kinds of foods that cry milk or their own juices rot in her drawer.

B. Lee dreams she rolls the body into place and then she rolls the body away again and the body is still there. The yes and no rhythm of the heart monitor or the variable foot the heart monitor prefers. The first time dying was walking out an unmarked door to smoke and the door locked behind her. Behind the body was a sign, explaining it. The first time dying was rough was about three times.

I know because she told you with her eyes. Cups clapped over the mouth or skin for sealing something back to its trailhead.

Concealing something back into its nail head, hitting the silt on the pathway and rolling it away and the body is still there. The body is on stilts across the intersection and the light is not going to favor her. In her very first dream B. Lee tells the first half of the body she can find that this isn’t the way she wants to be a citizen. The body gives

B. Lee twenty-four hours over and over again.

Left in the dark, we all got a bad case of epithet mouth. I know you remember what I used to call you. Daisy chains extend the grieving process, we held position until squirrely-eyed dawn, when all props are strung out and recoiled again. How many weeks since the longest day of the year? We tied knots in our shirrtails to remember, and all the soul

singers dropped out of the trees. Still there were the sirens in unison, calling after all reason. “I thank you,”

we repeated in rounds, to keep our tongues

from freezing to the cheat sheet, to boogey off the lava and ergot.

“I married Isis on the fifth day of May But I could not hold on to her very long,
So I cut off my hair and I rode straight away For the wild unknown country where I could not go wrong.” Between times the flood meadow is broken up into roofless plots twisted by opossums and foot-a-night vine. We can't find the book with the plant names in it. Something that looks like blood-daisies and the soft purple star-bursts that happen later below the skin.

The prickly-fleshed invaders they sometimes call “little travelers” whether favoring roadside agrimonies or the tall hairy kind. We call everything Devil's Bootjack and stamp it down like a begging blood-sucker. We chop off the tops of the slithering species and observe them comingling on the fence perimetering us until nightfall. If I put this under the nose of any stranger the story like the jaw of a snapping turtle will not let go until she’s nothing but a simple lure system and some fortunate bones. Good luck is a dark woolly band completing the dream sequence without external interpretation. I stare it down into the sinkhole I think her body is at the bottom of. When it goes from bawl mouth to bay I know enough to spread out the freshest bunting.

Waking up outside the body and hunting for some new trespass opportunity: the ugly bird comes closest to the decision making process which sprouts a red racing stripe of infection. How many days since raring to go native: full of unfamiliar spores and scarecrow dexterity. Did not leave but was transplanted from the remains of the wood to another newer growth forest. Stick five-fingered hand in the dirt pull

it out do so

also with quiet

opossum left spread out like a map adjacent to the ugly

song the ugly

bird flips around

on us in our own vocabulary.

To turn out of song into a fur bearing region you need a shed eye and the right kind of shovel. I am speaking for all parts of us; recessive country can’t make a blue-eyed offspring. Humming on the line won’t make it jump. Ravine dances

don’t go down on a first name basis. The first person ever is quarantined who asks which side we fall on. Rode hard maybe but we favor. We were not trying the patience of any leather bound story. We just dried her off and practiced nickel magic. We just raised a couple hackled questions.

The first time I saw our fair self step outside of our darkened body she made a meal out of us. Scratch that. For us, a long deep cut down any kind of trunk elicits something thirst-quenching and unspeakable, sticking the mouth up inside of the flashlight instead of vice versa, until the full tongue fills up the lowest hardwoods where the body is night-revisioned.

Scratch that. Where the body is replaced in the vise. She pressure cooked some squirrel in the middle of nowhere, scratch that, our story. And opening slash closing in like a rabbit skin newly separated, the lighter one said taste of

d this quarry or skin it up again so I can follow close to what I know.

There wasn’t time to worry over repetition, it wasn’t the time to call her bluff.

I quickened and fixed myself to her, to the hand that raises her dead.

We are exacting like furs are exacting, we are narcoleptic like furs are narcoleptic, we are dead language like furs are dead language, we are black holes, we are still full of blood, we line

the wood's edge, we hold the shape of the edge of the woods, we remember what seasonal flooding smells like on the third and fourth day, along the vertebrae we turn into a hard timber sound that carries an inside out of it, unexpected rings. We are a trapper arm full thrown in a hole, use pronouns this way to aerate the residence. Hollow where the body has rested is full of false dragon head (the obedient plant) and slender-stalked guara. Braided from the back we’re still attentive and rising, vestigial partners, ba-bum-ba-bum goes the birdsfoot violet when we grow too close to the highway. A half-inch further and we would have been decoy instead of demonstration. We feel our modes of transportation migrating deep into the offal thicket and we know exactly how we’ll be covered come winter. The bill isn’t actually made of ivory but it takes a shine to the story and drills a perfect place for a ring to go. Did the body grow up gnawing at it? Can she tell us what they called it where she came from?

We drive the lump of skin and developing bone back and forth until we can’t hardly stand it anymore. We used to be unknowing how to affect change in the line. Now milk is wrapped in a soaking tarp scrap red as that curiosity. The smell of light self is what we ate for supper last night, though we camped miles apart. We reconnoiter the body with our own localized sensorium and fill mystery pockets with buck-eyes, wild seng, seven different meats straight off the source. Light self is not the same as when delivered but nobody’s changed their name, which means every night comes together on the ridge, partial illumination. We trick out her sonar by throwing clod hoppers into the darkness, but this isn’t solid entertainment. The narrative of she flies toward it.
Between times, we can’t tell if it’s the meanest branches that sparkle. The body incubates a mess of kittens and airwave's final say whether the river will stay solid or ask us to go around it. We have only learned bird aphorism from this side of the bed and the body’s story is no good to us sieved like this with interruption. What falls between body and light self is the land bridge on which so much passed-down variation rested. What grows between the cast-off clothes and the cast-iron eyeball is partial godliness, a quarter

tendency to turn out the bottoms for fuel.

The body wants a more solid bog boot, the little fin inside the tale stopped progressing along these lines. Every time we repeat the experience we append sensation to the nightjars. Body touches lips and makes them feel broke and rushing. No way to put it that won’t sink in.

We return with deep pockets of milk teeth and electrical boots which expect the feet to broaden. This is a metaphor trap with a curled hair trigger. Don’t chew off the ear of the handsome body. We don’t care that she cannot or will not tell our songs from Adam at this juncture. Make us cross and we will plant our taboo eyes deep in all your thriving plots, in perpetuity. Don’t pretend you don’t imagine the part we mean. The way we would part each other. A husband’s t-shirt leaves burn marks when swabbed across the body, thrown in mother-wasting ravines: better learn to act things out. Light self migrates from vestigial to working title, a long hole fluttering in the body’s hiatus, or time when the body does not familiarize.

The tickling sensation the body has gone off and there is no right way to be cautious. A husband’s t-shirt leaves us all representative and half bare despite the multiplying branches. We learn to call on her like she is separated, dressed as deep and well as we can circumscribe

the bullet in the dark meat. A husband’s effects among her pockets or vice versa. Recognition in rags on the other side of the story. She had no husband or wife to speak of.

The gruff hangs itself stringy along the colluvium, pressurized by fern patterns and botulised singing. Sinkers tied up our long sleeves early in the process, hygiene smiles and polished egg memorial slipped from underneath the body like a maternal feature. We need to cook the books before they catch up with us. Her voice like a cracked boy full of pellets when we charge her with something. What it’s like to be a light self, a little jealous superplus catkins.

The lines fought across it so this rise was rendered in the same ways the body got speckled, the orphans divvied, half divine as a membrane could we really only die right here.

By the time we flip her name pronounceable the veins have gone from womb-lavender to orchestra red, the kind you hear in woods alone. Every step covered by catkin optimism who knows if she’s turned on us. Marble mouthed and split-lipped at the site of home, a little factory exhausting unfiltered heavenward. The body aggravates the photographs by missing canines, molars, opportunities.

These are the most tender hours of decomp, before we dress in reversed layers, the passion play still to get through. For now we pour every basin’s water back down the well, to keep her from following too closely, we kiss her oranges and we kiss her grain.

Light as a feather stiff as we carry our prepositions across flood meadow to switching yard: black birds such hankering tulip poplars gather and hurt for open water little churches showing petrified pews. We rest on the other side of the body, running over pennies for the bad blood taste, throwing gamey expressions wide

open in lieu of filling in. We are still pulled into the tagged and bagged train car, Jacob's

Ladder tangled in the body's sleight

of hand.
The Black Mariah

"So come on in
It ain't no sin
Take off your skin
And dance around in your bones..."
In her photograph Baby Bunting

Lee hangs hard like green fruit off the spine of a Mongolian pony.

Where her eyelashes should be: rattlesnakes on full alarm. Her breasts a couple mushroom clouds, vitals full of holes where the red-headed gunslinger missed her apple. It looks like both a woman and a vase inside her pupils. Baby gives her lungs the slip and hides her bottom self beneath the third shell which no one ever chooses. THE WORMS CRAWL

IN plays on her cavities. Her dress

is made of x-ray tonic and snapping turtle secrets, the censors never get involved.

In the finale

they roll her stones away but she does not stop being mortified.

She is the dead everyone crosses the river to speak through. In podunks they call this trick THE FIFTH

SEASON, or TWO HEADED

OUT OF FULL DARKNESS.
An animal fork

without having without being snake-naked and gold. Sundry was made out of several contractions, “say my name” is dumb amnesiac short-hand for the public

green palisades of “it will come to us.” My head will not turn against all the body’s forms. If everything I held under water shocked the surface this waywardly I would stop nursing, live the life of one skin. I had two positions which were working and thinking.

Those days everything had eyelets imbedded. All was set in a minor vision. Some bleach-blonde children and a dog

head.
Inside the horse, every one of our valuables.

We call the act MUSCLE

DANCING outside our bosom crew. Don't start the poisoned princess act with me again. Your pins are glistening. Your mama was a flyer and your daddy read guts. Your vulnerabilities: tart seeds and your bawling calf. It stays black and blue no problem.

We've got sweet hay and body glitter. We generate our own lines and the babies cross-hatch good beards. Don’t pull that delicate material face. Your incubation days have turned you in to a pig, just rolling around inside the red-eye. If you ever want to pass for living again you better dust off the cathodes swallow the tongue and make an appearance.

How sky is taken out by the stranger object, a gathering velvet antler of experience, full throated reason collars the body in retrieval bells. Full color

spectacle open my sweat valves and fermentation taps attended the buttering of the lustral. Liminal. My antennas turn churn-tangled O sweet whipped sensory petrichor plus its vertical motion slicing out the black eye, probing narrow. Bitter to be home plucking imaginary string theory bite down into throttle, no longing place for everything, everything in my stitches.

We perform best when we listen to the bird inside the bird, dark bellied ugly augur song that likes to measure us out of space. For demonstrative purposes the body can affix to any orphan line. My eyes are bulls’ eyes, my calves are wet, pliable, the roped-in death of me. My mother is a fertility trick. We perform best when we admonish

our animals for the gaminess they visit upon our routine. We are not two of everything in a line, following the color spectrum. My father is a shadow on the image. I look for a bird inside a bird because it slips bones out of everything I touch.

I break the character and look for hours like a body

no one knew to recover.
The body was never sometimes was a was a was a had was had a head of mouths and us

but was not was an end on end only

buzzed and sometimes

rising a confluence

us the rubble enough

performance don’t muzzle the dead

Black box as the site of detection and retrieval; little red rider takes everyone down onto bad knees. DEAD MAN’S

BREAKFAST is double-sided ovulation and just hanging there until the animal grows into the circle. What articles of register will make it play in your Peoria we are three feet deep, which is half of the evening draw?

One season a year the body lights and it’s hours before we can walk through the ground without some bristle. Playing dead until the lens

fills up with penny eye candy. With one hand the body makes a home-shaped shadow. We follow even when she seems to sundown. Wire tangle beneath the scene's still hot from traveling,

which means a lot of table thumping.

Which means not letting it get out of your hands.

A smoking carburetor burns the body slick like apple mint balm or night reading
where the ribbon marks
A scalp
check beneath touch lamp, the body is fire proof curtains, the atmosphere’s shot out of hands making church and steeple shadows the children’s straight parts the crowd check the tongue.
Mid-performance the body forgets how to sound itself out of me, bloody lip is more conversation piece than fire starter. We shine the horse teeth with petroleum jelly, address each other by our money-making names. Body chops so fierce it draws a whole other body behind us, on the rails. Early morning I tell complete songs of the mortified extension, the roadside fumes and the body disappearing thumb first. Call UGLY UNCLE

all you want over these miracles. My condition shrivels when you cross the line with me. Yellow you are experiencing is not so much an expression as an installation. I grow, like a canary, cautious of our deepening talks.

The atmosphere’s shot out. The red-headed gunslinger says to do a double plot we would need another set of songs and blinders, propane torches and some bomb proof live stock. Display confusion over the cross over. Inside the three ring house Baby Bunting

Lee plumps and projects herself solid and at least black bear-sized. Bells are for articulation. Can we slip inside the body without aim? How did she make her mark, give you her word.

Matriarchal falsie union suit with petal

inserts and mythological inserts that draw out the tone. In time we know how to flap under fire but moments make us flower, ape everything true.

Bottleneck a better conduit than bone -- the gentleman’s face wrapped around

my windpipe like a herd of animals trying to fill a fence gap. Making connections, my hair falls out like a field of cottoning. The familiar perpetually out on simile. For it to turn up outside the window and wait mass in the trees. Let’s watch the yellow. Let’s try instead to favor the lines of others as they form on either side of us and shoot their mouths off.

Let's watch for any sinking in. The alternative is mum arrangements, seeing a flower change for us. It doesn’t come out of nowhere: this tap. Light the tip of the body.

Knuckle down my resistance face to pull. Pull back the scare to spread around. I name the infamous the repeating geography, language called luringly. Some feathers pasted the mirror. Way not because alliteration or whatever votive happy to wail across

to spread around. I name the infamous

protagonist after

I am afraid. I know this woman
Bone Period

"The first year I was out here because there were no flowers I began picking up bones." Honeysuckle horse

eendearment was the first spokes. It’s not feeling

Rose-breasted station peaches dead half your mouth from the can.

The body has dribbled light and fro until the grass is pearly. Is triangle open mouthed the body’s come to Jesus moment

says, Let

the stranger stay.
To stay dead

I would have to look at them

I would look forward

Early Spring

Down to the spring

I come to see you
After tagging the dust your body is made of sheets flash ceremoniously on the line, in the rain, I am a bone and I take a bone's pleasure around the ball joint, shading inside the names. When I pass your body in the hallway the illumination gives us three minutes of standing adjacent to the fetish dying. Electricity changes, there is no body to acknowledge through touch, I fling forward past my desires into the formal living room with its collection of bells and its collection of jaw bones. The sparkling line runs across my statement of purpose. To endanger all sense, I lay the body out of its own range of prediction. Token animal, what you know is circling the house, waiting for the first person or its shadow to appear. Without looking forward to sinking through the body, I am still mostly lover position. Place the bone in the window spider plant and beacon.

Distress light and blue-edged covers that in this progression like I was skin & bone a system I ran at first red spades. If I can’t see the body for days. Because I take a finger and a fine toothed meaning cicada for circadian. We had fruits we were going to be line, switch back if we weren’t careful we were going to poison the well.

The bone animals, because it was a hard winter are bottled up and glassed against the gun safe corner. A little breath of hay shaped to fall into the river. The body too wet and the berries are molded when everything else has been silenced.

Come down out of there and down where the body is sweetest, wild is not the terminology but counting draws the pictures. This is the kind of hay shaped to fall into the river. Otherwise hell is always on. A stuffed wildcat mounted the country. Anything that the body presented as origin was found to soften the lines, the neighbors’ fences. The body builds up to anything that can flap its tail and glow.

A percentage of the food supply is offered transformation. The body throws hay and hooves are signals of whiteness in dangerous, suicidal things. When the body is the body in the first place. Otherwise hell to understand the thing: the animals where the body is sweetest. Wild is not in the gun safe corner. A little breath the body loves but rather coveting

the bone animals, because it was a hard winter.
Up in back the line like the bank like the body to regulate what lived a pink

nylon for instance.

The initial flap dear stranger don’t be dead on first thing this morning needs which is to say to weigh down out

back

perennial, the body referred to for weeks as sister and worked over.

You’ve got a House

You’ve got a House anew

House talk to me

Pride Fear Dead then Sometimes

Hearing the Land

Forgotten the Name a Virgin of myself and you live there Alone Faint and

High Dead Sound

Two Faces Blood

Boiling for my Safety which we would remove to straddle I was Three now minutes of standing adjacent.

Last time I was a conduit we had a bed full of grain. I didn’t have to wait so long to sink my weights inside the body, as if catching my clothes on a very old nail. I’d kiss the hammering girl between the augurs, millet-mouthed without a television. As if they gather on the line to make it surface. I sequence the bone with canary color, honey face, whatever we wake when we rabbit ear. As if burning barns weren’t language enough, touch this handle and finger, come from another country. Tell me as if I’ve always been struck.

Water runs slowly through flat land some early maps transliterated the body's apocryphal country an fever see Jesus'

first decade spotted horses worn by children with the dog’s eyes would not close my eyes for me as I descended to suggest movement to survive after everybody to bed inconsistencies will require no further attention if I never touch ink again. Being descriptive and what hole? Maybe a dog that pulls lights or the whites of their query. So the body’s under fathomable, position grows betwixt. Here everyone is thinning and a fault picks up heat from the engine. Picks up where the body left off.

Magical realism: when we reach the dead shaved to glowing, mouth of black art and high beams The body keeps revolving below the asphalt, fights late and becomes unresponsive to light companionship. Everything owned comes back turned miniature rap to the surface. This bone has a blaze orange ex, blue ex, missing trees replaced by swan necks, Oldsmobiles. Mineral deposits and animal deposits jar the wall come springtime. Coming to mid-river, hands full of a fish the shade I want for the body called Wiggle Room. Scrub down the walls come spring time and bury pits deep in citronella, marshmallow flowers. Now the body only drops its bones as amplifier, coyote proofing. Only eat something to remind us how to finish, only repeat the word crawling on my belly, in an emergency.

For the body’s first impressions in the tree, displaying broad red gestures. We see the river and take distress. The body says find the string of flame, parts her chest and starts out to the dizzy vessel. The body gets a mosquito so it seems we have an audience to Clean my House to Negative veil that rises to flirt with us Dear stranger I don’t think of the bones on the radio and take distress. The body says that

You can’t be dead on calling. Cleaning and come close Do not consume any

gestures. We see the river

stripe of deer's blood veil that rises

to flirt

with us to Replace to

We see the river

my House getting Ready

101
In her 1937 essay “Why I Like Detective Stories,” Gertrude Stein writes “I used to think that a detective story was soothing because the hero being dead, you begin with the corpse you did not have to take him on and so your mind was free to enjoy yourself” (147). There is no transitional “Now I think” to follow, and so the last two-thirds of the essay become “now”; in this continuous present detective stories are soothing when they “take place where there are lots of people” and “hold” when “strewn with people with plans with everything as well as with corpses there is a genuine abundance.” In Trick Rider, I am preoccupied with compositional process in relation to time, how time is experienced during the writing process and is communicated both through the text as an object and through the process of reading.

I am interested in all the ways the text can “hold”: to touch fully (how do you move from touching to holding) and perhaps take on some weight, to possess (which is sometimes metaphorical and/or illicit: “are you holding,” “do you have a hold over,” “can you get a hold of this”), to make a claim that is still partly abstracted or obscured, to borrow (“can I hold your pen a minute”), to wait or pause or hover, sometimes in pattern formation.

I am preoccupied with the remains of the epic form, with telling, to use Michael Andre Bernstein's phrase, “the tale of the tribe” for a tribe that is shifting and multifarious and legion in the New Testament sense that we are possessed or held up by tribe most fiercely when we are traveling in between places, in transition.
(The corpse always is.) Stein’s example of an enjoyable act of detection -- “why did somebody cut out a paragraph in the proof I was correcting…” (147) — is a question about decomposition. What does it mean to undo? Daniel Woodrell’s 2006 novel Winter’s Bone, an “Ozark noir” narrative, begins and ends with decomposition; its first paragraph describes Ree Dolly, the teenaged, female protagonist, waking up to see “meat…carcasses hung pale of flesh…skinned torsos dangling by rope from sagged limbs,” which are later identified as the bodies of deer which have been “left to the weather…so the early blossoming of decay might round the flavor, sweeten the meat to the bone” (3). The narrative ends with Dolly delivering her father’s severed hands to a local policeman in order to save her home from the bail bondsman and her family’s woods from the lumber mill. In between is a liminal rite: Dolly walks up and down the hollers, ceremonially engaging with her family of meth dealers, creating her own cold trail to follow.

I am interested in this sort of recreation on the part of both author and character; “the hero being dead,” the time line is resituated and detection becomes an act of prophecy. Fanny Howe describes the difficulty of this kind of textual recreation in her essay “Bewilderment”:

There is literally no way to express actions occurring simultaneously. If I, for instance, want to tell you that a man I loved, who died, said he loved me on a curbstone in the snow, but this occurred in time after he died, and before he died, and will occur again in the future, I can’t say it grammatically. You would think I was talking about a ghost, or a hallucination, or a dream, when in fact, I was trying to convey the experience of a certain event as scattered, and non-sequential. I can keep UN-saying what I said, and amending it, but I can’t escape the given logic of the original proposition, the sentence which insists on tenses and words like “later” and “before.”
Howe does not attempt to “resolve the unresolvable” here, but rather to recognize “bewilderment” as an approach and a poetics, through which “Q--the Quidam, the unknown one--or I, is turning in a circle and keeps passing herself on her way around, her former self, her later self, and the trace of this passage is marked by a rhyme, a coded message for ‘I have been here before, I will return.’”

Though Woodrell’s Winter’s Bone is not experimental in its use of syntax or generic tropes, it prioritizes the positions of the disenfranchised; particularly women and children, positions which Howe writes are best represented by a poetics of bewilderment. By focusing on language and landscape as much as plot, Woodrell emphasizes the genre’s ability to “hold” the reader in a moment until that moment decomposes, allowing us to understand past and future as equally accessible (or inaccessible) possibilities, frameworks of knowledge and experience that can collapse into the present and become palimpsest. The possibility of the collapse of linear narrative in such a novel is not only personally enjoyable, but also socially important.

Trick Rider began as a series of poems exploring the metamorphosis of “genius” – from the spirit of a place to a muse to an individual, intellectual, and egoistic attribute; when the writing process started, the poems had a protagonist, and though her body morphed and was occasionally subject to violence, though she traveled alongside and among the dead, like Alice Notley’s Alette, she was very much alive.

Linear narrative is not something I have much experience creating, but this character was visiting me in a similar way that sound patterns have, in the past, shown up and requested some engagement, and so I started making and observing a space for those visitations: waking up at five a.m. every morning for three months, and for two or three hours doing something akin to automatic writing, through which I engaged with the visitation both through the location of image and narrative and detection of a line.

Form was organic; in the early weeks, exploring narrative more deliberately, there were regular, long units of text that tried to provide room for both the sentence and the line. As with some of Anne Carson’s hybrid works, the line break was key, but there was space to let it fall momentarily out of sight.

In the later weeks, line length varied considerably, as did pronouns, points-of-view, and narrative structure, and I began to understand these inconsistencies and variations as important to the nature of the visitation, and the process it was enacting. I began to understand that the linear progression I had imagined for myself – from writer of lyric poem to writer of epic poem – was faulty and limited, that the text was more chimera than intersection: asymmetrical, cross-bred, unrealistic, and if not self-aware or fire-breathing, at least possessing its own processes.

In “Twelve Writings toward a Poetics of Alchemy, Dread, Inconsistency, Betweenness, and California Geological Syntax,” Brenda Hillman presents a poetics of alchemy, in which process changes the qualities of matter, and yet product is not—for the alchemist—the ultimate goal:

For many ancient peoples, stone is a living seed. The desire for gold actually comes at the end of a process of stone worship. Making gold is not the point, and having it is certainly not what's good for us. The fire is supposed never to go out. (281)

The stack of pages that resulted from those morning visitations turned into a source for “trance and chance” operations, a field of text I wandered in, pulling phrases, lines, forms, images, sounds, and gestures for the final manuscript.

I have always been interested in chance operations as considered and performed by artists like Marcel Duchamp and Jackson Mac Low, through which the will of the individual artist is constrained by or removed from the artistic process, but in my own experience those creative processes have felt unconnected to any source. How do you find meaning in chance? In her 1931 essay “The Narrow Bridge of Art,” Virginia Woolf argues that science, technology (especially communications technology like the radio), new theories of identity, and the experience of war have all made the lyric voice obsolete: “it is in this atmosphere of doubt and conflict that writers have now to create, and the fine fabric of a lyric is no more fitted to contain this point of view than a rose leaf to envelop the rugged immensity of a rock.”

Jackson Mac Low's 1985《The Virginia Woolf Poems》，created by a diastic “spelling through” of two of Woolf's novels, seems to present an alternative “lyric” voice: one that bears little resemblance to the “intense,” “personal,” and “limited” “cry of ecstasy or despair” that Woolf describes, but instead a lyric that borrows from those technologies and reflects new and changing concepts of identity, the lyric voice Brenda Hillman describes when she writes:

There's something about the "I" that is stretchy now; I think of the work of poets like Alice Notley and others. There are so many different ways of being personal. Like Michael Palmer's poem "I Do Not." Who's writing in that poem? It's not a persona, it's not just a "Michael"; it's some statement that goes down a long tunnel of possibility. That much more stretchy sense of "I" really interests me, but one that doesn't lose the depth and feeling tones.

Through Trick Rider I discovered the relationship between constant (the visitation, those morning pages) and variable/chance that is necessary to make chance operations illuminating and oracular, light of the eye.

And yet this is still about bewilderment; equally important to Trick Rider is Robert Duncan's "little endarkenment," the mystery that the poem confesses and engages with. During the writing process I revisited pages (often chosen via bibliomancy) of C.D. Wright's long poem Deepstep Come Shining, interested in her use of the long-poem form and a voice that seems to balance the personal and the communal, but I was also ultimately drawn to the book's meditations on literal and metaphorical light and blindness. I drew connections to Homer as both blind and leader of the blind, hostage and boomerang, one and legion; to John Milton's literal and metaphorical blindness as it is referenced in Paradise Lost, when he addresses the muse; and Radios, Ronald Johnson's erasure of Paradise Lost, which can be read as both an enlightening and an endarkening of Milton's text. And I drew connections to the high-contrast light and dark that has become a characteristic element of film noir, an aesthetic that both illuminates and makes mysterious the body in question, the act of detection.

When I woke up at five a.m. to write, the sun had not yet risen, and I used the artificial illumination of a lamp and the computer screen. As the sun rose, shadows were cast by all the primary bodies, some of which I hadn't noticed before, and a different relationship between illumination and obscurity developed, one whose complexity informed the ways I approached causality and linear progression in this manuscript. My original formal concept – 24-page sections that follow a circadian rhythm – began, like the “intersection” of epic and lyric voice, to seem too dichotomous and limited for the poem that was developing.

It was around this time in the process that the hero of the poems seems to have died. I admit that I am still unsure, as author and reader of this text, when and if I can pronounce the hero dead, and my ambivalence about the implications of this makes it hard to move on to the enjoyment.

Georgia O’Keeffe moved on from painting flowers to painting bones when she moved from New York to New Mexico, because bones were what was available in the desert. She argues that the bones of her later paintings do not resemble death or make her think of death: “They are very lively.” In opposing death with liveliness, O’Keeffe seems to be disregarding the decompositional, generative qualities of death; she seems to be arguing that the bones are not about death because they open a conversation rather than concluding it.

In her compositions, O’Keeffe often places her found bones against sky, fields of color, floating in air, occasionally alongside other objects; she uses them as a medium or channel to help us better see the light or color adjacent. The bone, like the present, is not isolate or uncontaminated. Bones, like moments, become a deep way of navigating or situating: a mapping for the bewildered. In an interview about “writing place,” C.D. Wright argues,

The mapping of the city is integral to the subject. But as markers of the art, “a sense of place” and “finding one’s voice” have no resonance left. I might read/read out of/skim/leaf 40 books or more when I am working on a project that attaches to a particular place. It is all just to situate myself so I can navigate the material more effectively, and with greater awareness of its affect.

Possession, here, becomes suspect, because it isolates or delineates both “self” and tribe; once a writer has “a voice” and “a place,” there is literally a limit to its resonance. To possess a place, and vice versa, is to draw boundaries. Georgia O’Keeffe describes hauling buckets of bones from New Mexico to New York to continue her work with them there. This kind of recreational, bewildered mapping enacts an awareness of affect. O’Keeffe understands the fertile and cross-pollinating possibilities of the bone, which are already present and casting their shadow, and she engages with them outside of their conventional boundaries of place and time.

There is also a violence to this selection. In Precipitations: Contemporary Poetry as Occult Practice, Devin Johnston writes about a similar violence in the fragmentary and ambiguous syntax of Susan Howe’s work. For Johnston, the violence of Howe’s process is significantly correlated to the violence of her “content,” the time and space with which she is engaging; they create a palimpsest, a gather and scrape, in which one is read through the scrim of another; these layered and bewildered violences illustrate a difference between a mediated translation process and a more immediate experience of dictation. Johnston quotes Howe on Jack Spicer’s “concept of dictation”:

Well, I do believe that Spicer radio-dictation thing, as I read it in Robin Blaser’s essay on Spicer—that poetry comes from East Mars. But the outside is also a space-time phenomenon. I think the outside, or East Mars, partly consists of other people’s struggle and their voices. (147)
Here, Howe doesn’t demystify or simplify the act of dictation, but rather illustrates the daily necessity of it. Poetic channeling draws one deeper into, not away from, daily life and a community of others, but that intimacy often requires, or at least presupposes, a wound.

In “The Feminine Epic,” Alice Notley writes of her character “First Woman” from _The Descent of Alette_:

One of my poet friends accused me of making simply an Earth Mother. As if that were a bad (or un-avant-garde) thing. But she isn’t an Earth Mother, she has gone to live “below” rather than “above,” to escape the degradation she’d experienced in the upper world. Her most marked quality is that she’s a storyteller: though she has no operative mouth, being headless, she can speak from the throat, and she has the ability to make you _be in_ her stories. Really then she’s like the source of dreams. Perhaps I’m saying that the split between conscious and unconscious began with the almost universal banishment of women from public and political life. (177)

In _Trick Rider_ I am perhaps also interested in walking through that open wound between conscious and unconscious and to explore the instructive possibilities of dream and the position of the stunt body, stunned body, stunted body that the text becomes. I am interested in what happens when I possess this communal, divined body.

In a recent post on the literary blog _Montevidayo_, Johannes Goransson writes about a similarly complex violence in Diane Arbus’s photographs. In response to Arbus’s claim that “there’s a quality of legend about freaks. Like a person in a fairy tale who stops you and demands that you answer a riddle,” Goransson discusses both how “riddles act like wounds in texts” and how the bodies in the photographs become “stunt bodies ... making the connection between art and death, moving across death's boundary.”

I am interested in connecting this to Flannery O'Connor’s famous statement, from “Some Aspects of the Grotesque in Southern Fiction,” about freaks: “Whenever I’m asked why Southern writers particularly have a penchant for writing about freaks, I say it is because we are still able to recognize one” (44). What does it mean to recognize, to know without becoming? Trick Rider is not ultimately an overtly gothic or grotesque text, but it borrows strategies from those genres, shifting pronouns, gazes, and points-of-view in order to explore this act of dictation, of recognition.

In Flannery O'Connor’s “A Good Man is Hard to Find,” one of her “freak” characters, The Misfit, blames his bewilderment on his inability to know whether Jesus raised the dead, at which point the grandmother recognizes him for the second time, at which point he shoots her. Though dramatically different in style and tone, Trick Rider takes cues from and engages with the simultaneity and longing of this interaction. In Trick Rider, the violence of recognition occurs in part through the riddle of fragmentation, of the broken line and the split voice, a textual body that plays stunt double for the process of writing it.

The “stunts” of contemporary trick riding originate from military/battle maneuvers: in the 1200s in Central Asia, horsemen would hang from their horses, pretending to be dead, until their enemy got close enough to attack. In Trick Rider, reader and writer are, at different points, possessed by and external to that performance of death and resurrection, but there is always the intention of intimacy.

In Trick Rider the concept of the double, or doppelganger, has been generative, not only in considering identity, but also through creation of and engagement with landscape. It has been useful to consider Joyelle McSweeney’s writing on the poetics of the necropastoral, which she presents as a term which denaturalizes the pastoral by focusing on its always/already unnatural qualities. In its classical form, the pastoral is a kind of membrane on the urban, an artificial, counterfeit, impossible, anachronistic version of an alternative world that is actually the urban’s double, contiguous, and thus both contaminatory and ripe for contamination, a membrane which, famously, Death (and Art) can easily traverse...

As an uncanny doppelganger of the pastoral, the necropastoral critiques the very hierarchy of the double. I was at first troubled by the death of the heroine of Trick Rider in part because I am uncomfortable with the implications of placing a seemingly-passive female body at the center of the text. I did not want to replicate that dynamic; I didn’t want my heroine to have to “play dead.” But as the poem kept returning to the inevitability of this premise, I considered how the dynamic could be decomposed through its twinning.

The polyphonic speaker of Trick Rider is a stunt double and experiences doubling, being both representative of and outsider to the community she channels; this tension is simultaneously cause and effect of the text. I am interested in this contradiction as it arises for any writer attempting to represent a community, and the way that contradiction is inherited by the hero of the epic poem – who is typically required to leave his or her community in order to represent or preserve it – so that the hero becomes a kind of stunt double for the writer.

By the time an epic poem begins, home has typically already become unheimlich, and the hero is compelled by mission or instinct to move deeper into the strangeness. In “The Fabulous Bilocation of B. Lee,” I try to explore the vulnerability of a community that is infested, living out of tents, as it ceremonially identifies and sends away its “hero.” There is cyclical burying and unearthing, emerging and invading, naming and obscuring, delineating and overflowing.

In “Return Period,” I create a landscape that’s very familiar to me, a bottomland that regularly floods, promoting both decay and a sense of the temporary. Most of this section occurs in the woods, with homes only referenced as ruins, roofless cinderblock foundations. An especially interesting type of detection happened during the writing of this section, because, from childhood, I either knew the look or the name of a plant I wanted to reference, but rarely both; recognizing the missing information via internet searches created an entirely unexpected uncanny space. I became interested here in a charged use of vernacular, a word that Daniel Tiffany, in Infidel Poetics, traces back to its Latin roots: the language of house slaves. As Tiffany notes, “the speaker of vernacular language occupies an ambiguous position that is at once within the master’s house...and fundamentally alien” (18). I am interested in the way vernacular both locates and dislocates us, emphasizing the liminal position of both reader and speaker, most overtly in this section but in more subtle ways throughout the text.
In “The Black Mariah,” the idea of “house” becomes theatrical, the tension between house and stage. I’ve borrowed the title from Thomas Edison’s production studio, which had a retractable roof and was situated on a turntable so that Edison could film by natural light as much of the day as possible. “Black Mariah” was also the nickname for police vans at this time. This section is the most overt representation of nekyia in the text, and I am able to more directly explore the act of channeling as a performance and a triangulated communication which challenges the notion of place/space.

“Bone Period” continues to explore that triangulation in the form of eros, considering the ambivalent nostalgia that appears in canonical epic poems like Homer’s Odyssey. Even when the speaker is inside a house, they are estranged, a traveler or stranger describing it as if from both a spatial and a temporal distance. In this final section of Trick Rider I borrow language from the editor’s notes and Addie’s chapter in William Faulkner’s As I Lay Dying. I am interested in how the body at the center of this novel functions in relation to the corpse at the beginning of Stein’s “detective stories:” not a self-contained representation of a crime, a foreign blot on a scene, but rather an oozing, smelling, (sometimes unpredictably) changing part of the environment, as elemental and “natural” as the flooded river.

While writing Trick Rider I spent a lot of time with Sally Mann’s photographic series “What Remains” and “Deep South.” Initially I was most intrigued by the photos Mann took at University of Knoxville’s “Body Farm,” a forensics laboratory where human bodies are left outside to decompose so that this process may be studied. It is interesting to see how distance and point-of-view create different experiences of the uncanny; full body shots with landscape may read like crime photos, while detail photographs allow us, through disorientation, to focus on the texture and line of a body part as part of a natural scene. I tried to engage a similar shifting of point-of-view in my writing.

As Trick Rider progressed, however, and the grotesque seemed less a focus, I became more interested in Mann’s photographs of Civil War battlefields, where the presence of the dead ultimately feels more graphic and challenging because it is without even the boundaries of the body; it permeates everything. An event in Mann's personal life – the suicide of an escaped prisoner who was evading capture in the woods near her home – seems to have prompted this transition of focus: “That’s when the whole question changed from ‘what does the earth do to a dead body?’ to ‘what does a dead body do to the earth?’” Like O'Keeffe’s “lively” bones, the body at the center of Trick Rider engages with the landscape in a manner that generates both mystery and illumination, in part by continuing to ask this question of positioning and relationship. How is and is not the body earthly?

As I begin working with the dictated source text I created during those first three months, I listened to two contemporary throat-singers: the Tuvan band Huun-Huur-Tu, and Canadian Inuit soloist Tanya Tagaq. I have been drawn to throat singing, or overtone singing, since I was first introduced to it, over a decade ago, because of the way its sounds mix “high” and “low”: the lower pitches and often harsh sounds created by a full body manipulation of air can sound almost animalistic and draw attention to the body as instrument, and yet the polyphony suggests a kind of channeling, a multiplicity of voices that could not possibly come from the body alone. Huun-Huur-Tu, a band from near the Mongolian border, sings songs inspired by the traditional songs of horse men; hearing the human/inhuman voice recreating the rhythm of horse’s hooves informed but did not shape the line in Trick Rider. More interesting in terms of a poetics was Tanya Tagaq’s work. Unlike Tuvan throat singing, Inuit throat singing is performed almost exclusively by women who sing in duets. It is such an intimate partnership that the women often hold onto each other as they sing, facing each other and standing so closely that it is as if they become one instrumental body, singing into each other’s mouths.

Traditionally, Inuit throat singing was considered a diversion and entertainment for women while men were out on the hunt. That Tanya Tagaq attempts to create the same resonances as a soloist on a stage for non-Inuit audiences can be seen as a violation, prioritizing the individual over the community, but I am interested in the potential for recreation and detection here, the possibility that this violent channeling helps us reconsider ideas about community, diversion, the body, and intimacy. I intend Trick Rider to engage in a similar kind of decomposition.
Works Cited

McSweeney, Joyelle. “Some Versions of the Necropastoral: Plath’s Ariel.” 10 April http://www.poetryfoundation.org/article/241040?id=241040

